Some of us even began to climb the mast, so that we could see farther away. We were supposed to land at Baltimore. I thought (all of us) we'd land in New-York. Soon we saw the U.S. coast. Many of us were gay and excited. We wanted to land as soon as possible. We were nearing CHESAPEAKE BAY. We would reach Baltimore in the afternoon tomorrow. Most of us didn't sleep at all the last night. We were still in chesapeake Bay. All we saw when we looked out of the portholes was ships passing by, and in the distance, smokestacks of factories. It seemed to be very industrial.

The next morning we all were eager to see the U.S., at least part of it. We were near the railing watching other boats. Anyway, we landed not very much later. We were at Baltimore. As we were by the dock, cameramen took pictures of all of us standing near the railing. We weren't allowed to leave the ship until in the afternoon. We were met by the Red Cross in the harbor, and then boarded a bus which took us to the station.

At the station we took our train to NEW-YORK CITY.
